They Called It Appomattox

by Mike Seay

That morning in early April will never be forgotten. Throughout the annals of time history will point to this little Virginia village not only as a landmark of peace, but as an end to a civilization, forever disbanding the memories of the ante-bellum south.

They called it Appomattox. By the Spring of 1865 the face of this rural Virginia community had shown the scars of a civil war. For four years this once peaceful village called Appomattox had been drained of the life-blood of its young. The periods of sacrifice and suffering could never be restored to normality, nor could the never-say-die sentiment towards a lost cause be ever taken from the hearts of the natives of this battered but proud land.

The Confederacy stood on weakened knees on the morning of April 9th, chiefly composed of a skeleton army called the Army of Northern Virginia. An army of a proud name, and composed of devoted southerners reaching for one last grasp at the life they so dearly loved and cherished.

Little did these weary soldiers know as they continued westward from Petersburg that history had destined them to be soldiers of fortune with the death of their cause ahead in this small village called Appomattox.

On that morning of April 9th, the hearts of a saddened and destroyed people stopped beating. As the sun came over the horizon on this beloved Virginia Soil, three erect and steadfast figures rode westward toward the village of Appomattox. As the rays of sunlight beamed upon them, their gray uniforms seemed to enlighten as a symbol of a dying but gallant people. General Robert E. Lee, Col. Marshall, his personal secretary, and Lee's orderly, Sgt. Tucker, moved slowly toward Appomattox Court House, bearing the tears and saddened hearts of the entire Confederacy. The end had come, but their honor and self-respect could never be destroyed.

With dignity he never abandoned, General Lee arrived at the McLean home in the early afternoon, dressed in a neat, well-pressed uniform of Confederate gray. General Grant arrived some thirty minutes later wearing the mud-spattered uniform of a private, with the rank of general strapped upon his shoulders. The two men composed a contrast in appearance and lifestyle, but both were soldiers, and far more important, both were gentlemen. The parlor of Wilmer McLean would soon be filled with the remnants of the bloodiest war in American history. The Confederacy and what it stood for had all but ended as General Lee and Col. Marshall faced Grant and his staff of some ten officers. The ceremony was brief as the South's most loved and respected leader laid down the arms of the Confederacy, and the Southern folklore which now could only be remembered and never re-lived.

For on this day of April 9th,the overpowered Confederacy was no more. Hearts were sad,but the character of a destroyed people could not be blemished. The name Appomattox will always be remembered as an end to strife and war, but never as an end to loyalty and devotion to a cause for which they so gallantly fought.
